

National Mustard Museum

Barry Levenson was a lawyer when he started collecting mustards. In 1992, Levenson left his job to open a museum where he could display his growing mustard collection. At the National Mustard Museum, you can find mustards from all over the USA, from _____ (your home state) to _____ (another state). Mustard is made from mustard plants.

In one of the museum's rooms, there was a tasting bar. We tried Dijon-style, yellow and brown mustards. Dijon-style mustard is a creamy mustard that has uncrushed brown mustard seeds in it. This mustard is named after the French city of Dijon. I thought we should try it on _____ (your favorite snack).

There were also many unusual mustard flavors, such as chocolate, blue cheese and _____ (your favorite fruit). Experts called "Confidential Condiment Counselors" guided us through the tasting. Sam liked mustard on _____ (your favorite food) the best and I liked mustard on _____ (your second favorite food).

We were really enjoying ourselves when museum workers suddenly burst into song! It was such a surprise that it made us _____ (action word). The song they sang was called "Roll Out the Mustard." What a fun museum!

You won't believe what we found in Middleton - the National Mustard Museum! It displays more than 5,000 mustard varieties from all over the world. We wrote a story for you about our adventure. Before reading it, ask a friend to come up with words that fit the descriptions in the parentheses. Fill in the blanks with your friend's words and then read the story back to your friend.
